Hultkrantz: A Legacy of Creativity

When it comes to discussing influential literary figures, one name that resonates with readers of all ages is Sir Terry Pratchett. Known for his witty and imaginative storytelling, Pratchett was a master of the fantasy genre, creating an entire universe known as Discworld. But behind every great writer is a supportive network, and in Pratchett's case, that support came from none other than his daughter, Geraldine Pratchett Hultkrantz.

A Creative Heritage

Growing up in the Pratchett household, creativity was a way of life for Geraldine. She was exposed to her father's writing process from a young age, observing how he crafted complex characters and weaved intricate plots. This upbringing ignited her own passion for artistic expression, and it wasn't long before she began forging her own path in the creative world.

As a child, Geraldine dabbled in various art forms, experimenting with painting, sculpting, and even music. She inherited her father's fascination with the fantastical, often incorporating magical themes into her artwork. Her talent and dedication were evident, and it soon became clear that Geraldine was destined to leave her mark on the creative landscape.

This is the story of my father's adventures and experiences as a Naval Mine and Torpedo Disposal Officer during World War II. He was one of the chosen few to be in the 30th Assault Unit under Commander Ian Fleming of James Bond fame. In fact Ian Fleming incorporated the tasks and experiences of the 30th Assault Unit in his books about James Bond. My father was sent behind enemy lines to capture code books and torpedoes, and even high-ranking officers of the enemy.

After the Allies had regained control in Europe my father was sent to the Far East together with a colleague to capture a very special torpedo that the Japanese had developed. Whilst they were there the Japanese surrendered and they were able to get hold of the desired torpedo and ship it back to England.

Lucky to still be alive my father returned to Britain in August 1946, and this stranger came into my life. I had only seen him once during the six years that he was away. As he was still under the Official Secrets Act when he died in 1967, he never talked about his war years but luckily he left a great number of documents and over one hundred photographs that he managed to take during the war which have helped me in my research to write this book. I have been able to use many of his photos.
