The work that follows is a composition of two kinds of poems.

The first kind of poems have come from music. I started a Spotify radio based on a song I love called “Lost for Words.” I listened to the songs as I was working throughout the day and I found they brought me good spirits. One afternoon, waiting for a friend at lunch, I found my fingers on a computer keyboard to Philip Glass’ Etude No. 2. I was in the word processor anyway, writing a report for a client, and with eyes closed, the music poured into words on the screen on new pages for me.

It’s become a fun game, playing the words to these piano songs.

A series of instrumental solos, each titled by the composer, with me as an accompanying orchestra member of words.

Each of the following poems was not created by me, but simply discovered. I have done my best to clear my mind and discover what each of these songs has to offer beneath their notes. To bring a written aspect to their aural tones is to aim to paint another dimension of the plane they already exist on. Hopefully I have done well enough in developing vision and dexterity through these “drills.”

The second kind of poems have come from a larger observation around a music that is less obvious. The changing of the seasons has become more tangible to me as I have spent more time in this world. There is a different energy with each of the weeks and months passing by us, before these cycles revisit us again.

Instead of seeking “optimal,” in my life or the world at large, I am increasingly fascinated with what the rhythm of these patterns looks and feels like. There is a kind of idea at large, in which, if one could identify the spirit of the time within its proper moment, there would be no “best” mood, but there would be a mood of the current moment, which could be seized and utilized for exactly what it was, no more and no less.

I do not yet completely understand these concepts yet myself, but I find them fascinating, and I find them important. I have tried to experiment and put to paper what I have found in the world so far. May it hopefully serve us all forward.
