The stone face is said to be a representation of Sherry, forever frozen in time, eternally waiting for her lover to return. Legends further suggest that the face holds mystical powers, granting those who dare to visit it with good fortune and protection from evil.

Unveiling the Mystery

With so many rumors swirling around this enigmatic stone face, adventurers and researchers alike have flocked to the depths of the forest in hopes of uncovering the truth behind Sherry Macdonald. Armed with the latest technology and an insatiable curiosity, they have spent countless hours studying the face, conducting tests, and documenting their findings.

One researcher, Dr. Emily Williams, believes that the stone face is not a natural formation but rather an ancient work of art crafted by a long-lost civilization. With its intricate details and anatomical accuracy, Dr. Williams argues that the face could belong to a forgotten deity, worshipped by the indigenous people who once inhabited the area.

On the other hand, paranormal investigator John Thompson suggests that the face is a portal to a different realm. He claims to have witnessed strange occurrences in the presence of Sherry Macdonald, including unexplained voices, ghostly apparitions, and even time distortions. Thompson believes that the face holds a key to unlocking hidden dimensions beyond our current understanding.

The year is 1964 and first-time film director Alan Schneider is about to embark on a project combining the talents of Buster Keaton and Samuel Beckett. When Alan visits the home of Keaton to discuss the project, titled simply Film, he discovers the former star engaged in an imaginary card game with the long-deceased Irving G. Thalberg.

It doesn't take long for Alan to realize that he has entered into an altered universe resembling the surreal world of the Buster Keaton film, a world where doors solve problems and card games provide lessons in life. Alan turns to Beckett for help in making sense of this world, only to find that Sam is perfectly at home in it.

The Stone Face tracks Alan's journey through the maze that is the world of the Keaton film, a world which, as the making of Film progresses, also takes on elements that might be found in a Beckett absurdist play. By examining the making of Film, as well as the comedy of the Keaton film, the play examines the process by which we create art in general as well as the process by which we live our lives.

Praise for The Stone Face:

"[L]ocal playwright Sherry MacDonald skillfully manages to pay homage to Buster Keaton and Samuel Beckett while jibing at subjects as diverse as theatre of the absurd, Abbott and Costello and academic literary theory. ... both my hands are clapping."(ReviewFromTheHouse)

"The energetic tone of the piece is rich and appealing. The slapstick world of Buster Keaton is exploited to full theatrical effect. The voices are vivid, unique, and imbued with useful subtext." (Steppenwolf Theatre, Chicago)

"A wonderfully clever and inventive tale of an interesting collaboration. The comic traditions of Buster Keaton and other silent film stars are drawn on to create a story of a man coming to understand the nature or genius and the mystery of great art." (Actors Theatre of Louisville)
