Visual content is a key aspect of journalism. Today's social media tools empower every smartphone owner with the ability to take photos or videos anytime, anywhere, leading to what researchers call Citizen Journalism. Among the many social media platforms used primarily for visual content, Snapchat is a fast-rising star, especially among the young. It was originally developed as a student project at Stanford University in 2011. When compared to other visual social media tools, it offers a unique feature: “snaps” — images with visual or text annotation — are temporary; they disappear shortly after being viewed.

More recently Snap Inc. has added professional content to Snapchat in the form of Snapchat Discover. A small group of media organizations (including such established outlets as CNN and National Geographic) are selected by Snap, Inc. to publish fast-moving short videos and snaps of interest to its young and majority female audience. Snap Inc. has also announced plans as part of its initial public offering of stock to invest heavily in augmented reality. This study examines Snapchat through the lens of journalism theory and practice. While there is some research and commentary in the scientific literature specific to Snapchat, much relevant theory predates Snapchat specifically. The author has selected theoretical aspects he finds especially intriguing to explain the Snapchat phenomenon and to explore its relevance as both tool and medium for journalism.
